Inrest was all agog when on the very silowing day a great car drew up at the ourb of the Hotel Ritz and a uniformed official made his way haughtily past the servants. paused for an instant at the deak and read aloud the name written upon the great square envelope he bore. R chanced that Kitty herself was in one of the partors near at hand. She heard her name called, and ignorant at first of the nature of the visit. stepped out to the desk to see what might be meant. To her the official bowed deeply, and, having delivered the envelope to the lady who was warranted to him to be the true owner of this missive, departed to his

. What woman, had she the wit would not have planned the little revenge which Kitty now schemed? She venge which kitty now schemed? She knew that the eyes of the brigade were upon her, yet carelesely she opened the great envelope, glanced at its contents and seemed indifferently to put it aside. Even, as though by accident, she brushed it from the counter to the floor as she turned and left it lying there.

accident, she brushed it from the counter to the floor as she turned and left it lying there.

The clerk did not notice the fall of the missive, nor did any servant. None had time, for scarcely had Kitty passed before one of the ladies, who all this time had been consumed with curiosity, managed to stroll toward the counter and stoop to pick up the envelope. Deliberately she opened it, but then, with a word of apology, restored the enclosure and handed it to the clerk.

"I beg pardon," said she, "R is for Miss Kitty Gray, I see. Would you had it in her box for her?"

She returned to the brigade with her face a deep red in anger. "It is the invitation from the palace—to the ball, the black and white ball—yes, she has it. And I swear—what is our country coming to? For my own part, I shall not go."

"Nor I! Nor I!" eshoed yet others. The fat dowager alone chuckled. "I would not if I were you, my dears," had also.

can figure of woman, slight yet sliken-strong; her wide eyes full of sophistication, yet full as well of trust of the kindliness of all manking a intent toward her-as all American women believe is the wish of the world regarding them-her red-brown hair piled high and fastened by a single clasp-yes, any who had seen Kitty Gray then, so different from the beauties of Gretzhoffen, must have commended the judgment of her costumer-and her own ratification thereof-without the least reserve.

The costume itself, simple and sure

The costume itself, simple and sure in its long, true lines, was becoming, as Kitty assented to herself. The gown was decollete—very much so, in the European fashion. Kitty wore no jewels, because she was not of those who could afford them. The case on her dressing table now held but a few simple rings and brooches, trifiing things which had been given her or which from time to time she had purchased for herself. She did not attempt to use them now, realizing that they would not serve for such an occasion, and having nothing with which to replace them.

The only thing of value which lay The costume itself, simple and sure tonish!" Thus the gownmaker, who upon the table was something which inally, having completed his labors, stood off in admiration. "You will be to display. The broken coin—how stood off in admiration. in the regal invitation to a 'Mack and soon to be given, over the prospects in the most beautiful as well."

It was the morning of the great black and soon to be given, over the prospects in the most beautiful as well."

It was the morning of the great black and white ball when Kitty, her gown finally in her own possession, stood before the tall mirror in her rooms to give it its final proving. She stood with the absorbed frown with which a woman criticises her own figure on any extraordinary occasion, her face puckered at first into a frown, but breaking finally into a smile as wise enough in her own day and generation to know so of the reason why. Instant later, "I will do," said she, and added, an instant later, "I will do," said she, and added, an instant later, "I will do," said she, and added, an instant later, "I will do"—both statements being simple truths.

Surely any who had seen her then.
